

Mental health support for teens and adolescents

Adolescence can be a difficult time, and it may often come with an increased risk of mental and emotional health issues.¹ UnitedHealthcare offers resources that can help support your employees in caring for the well-being of teens and adolescents.

Building resiliency during the formative years

Adolescence (10–19 years) is an important time for creating social and emotional habits that may affect mental well-being, but some youth may struggle. Depression, anxiety and behavioral disorders are among the leading causes of illness and disability among adolescents. Suicide is the fourth-leading cause of death among 15–29-year-olds.¹

Additional concerns might include:

- Anxiety
- Mood disorders
- ADD/ADHD
- Eating disorders
- Psychosis

Deepening challenges for families

Adolescents have been facing greater mental health struggles than ever before. Many teens in recent years have struggled with feelings of frustration, isolation and uncertainty.

Parents/caregivers may have added stress as well. Caring for their children's mental health may mean parents need to sacrifice their own physical and emotional needs. The support they're able to give their children may be impacted by factors such as available time and resources, potentially leading to further concerns for both parents and their children.

of family caregivers suffer from depression, twice the rate of the general population⁴

Providing emotional support when it's needed most UnitedHealthcare offers a wide variety of resources designed to help families, supporting them with challenges they may face. Our large behavioral health network includes providers who specialize in adolescent care, telehealth options and more.

Many services may be available to your employees and their families. Check your plan details for coverage on these and other possible forms of support.

- Self-help resources, including Self Care from AbleTo
